Warning to enemies against something unpleasant is given by the conspicuous appearance of certain unpalatable moths, and the white tail of the rabbit is a signal to its friends in time of danger. Mimicry might be defined as false warning and signalling colours, repelling enemies by the deceptive suggestion of something unlessant and dangerous, or attracting prey by he deceptive appearance of something pleasing to them. Protective mimicry is illustrated by Indian and African butterflies, which closely resemble other species possessing a nauseous taste and conspicuous appearance. Instances of aggressive mimiory are found in certain flies. which lay their eggs in the nests of bees, etc., and are coloured like the latter, so that they can approach with impunity. Alluring colouring may be considered under this head and illustrated by a-lisard-with pink flower-like structures at the corners of its mouth, to attract insects; by a fresh water tuctle, which attracts its prey by daugling two worm-like filuments; and by the lures of various fishes, which are phosphores cent in the case of deep sea forms. An interestng fact is that even the foreign objects commonly associated with a mimicked species may be copied, an example being a South American insect which resembles a common leaf-carrying ant together with the leaf itself.

"I can trace for you the scientific uses of curiosity," declares Dr. Andrew Wilson, "just as Tyndall sought out for us many years ago the scientific uses of the imagination. What is all science, may I ask, save curiosity—arranged, orderly, systematic curiosity ? To question the 'whys' and 'howa' of nature is the business of the scientist. He questions and cross-examines nature, just as a barrieter badgers his witnesses: and, as a result, our scientific friend gets at the truth about things by reason simply of his curiosity. He has no need to be curious, but his desire to know is born in him. It is part and parcel of his constitution, and in the exercise of it he builds up the knowledge which makes him and his race, intellectually, physically, nay, even financially - rich. This is the science of curiosity; but for curiosity there would have been no science at all. Henceforth you must think of curiosity, bridled and trained as the kind of genius which takes us all as children by the hand and leads us, eager to know, that we may learn the secrets of the Universe. The idea that electricity flows through a wire

Dr. B. W. hordes which for activity, magnitude, and venom Foothow are to the New Jersey species what a hawk is to Amoy a sparrow. On the portuges of the Cascade Mountains in British Columbia even the Indians are put to flight by what is known in that region as the "lion" mosquito. In the Alaskan Canton swamps even the thick-furred bear is mobbed to Macao death by these agile and merciless termenters. The fact that these insects attain such dimen-

The equally indubitable fact that they throw thems-lyes furiously and unbesitatingly upon whatever warm-blooded animal comes their way shows that at least they have no vegetarian prejudices.
